Mr. Zane found everybody anxious to know who the lovely young creature on his arm was, and Miss Nellie Chotez—his summer acquaintance—could not conceal her surprise and displeasure. However, after a delay of a few moments, waiting for strangers, which was spent in wit and repartee, the whole party of fashionable young people, in the best of spirits, set forth again to pounce upon the wealthy bachelor. He welcomed them all with the greatest cordiality and delight, and soon his palatial home was ablaze with light. Again introductions were in order, and after being himself introduced to the handsome captain, Wallie said:

"Allow me to introduce you to Capt. Fitzhugh—Miss Nye," and then he wished he had never come."

What is it—a single glance of an eye? A smile? The intonation of a word? A something—and the most obdurate, stubborn heart surrenders—a willing, happy slave forever after. Poor captain, he who had passed through many battles, received a wound that evening from which he never recovered. He met his ideal. He came to Nye (nigh)—pardon the pun, it is worth $2.10 though—and bachelor bliss instantly vanished into thin air and became a myth—a delusion and a snare. Others did not notice it, but Mr. Wallie did, and he saw breakers ahead—to leeward and to high—ha! ha! But wait, the end is not yet. It soon became evident to everyone present that the beautiful Mrs. Zane, alias Miss Nye, was the favorite of the evening, and the marked attentions shown her by the wealthy host were noticed by all present. He was ever by her side, listening to each word with a rapt and delighted attention, and he seemed sparkling over with wit and vivaciousness. The captain danced only with her during the whole evening, and when not dancing would lead her away to show her the different portions of his beautiful home, and its rare and costly contents, consisting of valuable paintings and bric-a-brac, gathered from different portions of the earth; a very beautiful piece of Gobelin tapestry, representing a clandestine meeting by moonlight of two lovers, heirloom as the captain explained to his delighted companion, who seemed deeply interested and amused. Refreshments were served and then after more dancing along in the wee sma' hours the party broke up—the gallant captain escorting Miss Nye to her carriage, having begged permission to call upon her at her home, and she not seeing her way clear to refuse, and thinking that in all probability he would never take advantage of the permission to call on her if granted, had pleasantly acquiesced and received a pleasant squeeze of the hand the captain was holding so fondly as he lingeringly bid her good night.

The ride home in the early morning was a quiet one. Wallie seemed unusually quiet and depressed, while his fair young wife was absorbed with her own thoughts and wondering what she should do if the captain should put in an appearance at her home. The next evening when Wallie returned from business he had regained his usual cheerfulness, and playfully twitted his wife of the quest she had made of the devoted captain, and so the days passed, and the New Year was ushered in with the usual accompaniment of horns and bells, and Mrs. Zane went about her arrangements for her receptions during the day, while her husband was busy making out his list of calls: the surprise party and the incidents attending it having passed entirely out of their minds.

Not so with Captain Fitzhugh, however. He had never, for a moment, forgotten a certain pair of sparkling bright eyes, and a silvery little laugh was still ringing in his ears, and a desire to look again into the one and hear the other was still strong within him. So very prominent upon his list of calls for the day appeared the name of Miss Nye. We will not attempt to describe the meeting that took place in Mrs. Zane's exquisitely appointed little parlor that afternoon. As a lady of most charming manners and unusual control of her feelings she received him with apparent delight, chatting with him in the most friendly and unconcerned manner, never once disclosing by her manners the troubled forebodings his undisguised admiration of her caused her, but after his departure there was a troubled look upon her lovely face that had not disappeared by the time her husband returned, and he ever attention—was quick to notice it, but attributed it to the fatigues of the day, for he said as he drew her to him and imparted a kiss upon her forehead, "Poor little woman—tired out, ain't you?"

Then to his question as to how many callers she had had and who they were, she told him about the captain and her fears that he was slugging in the very marked attentions shown her, and was possessed of an honest regard for her.

"O Wallie," she cried, "what shall I do? You must remember he believes me a young unmarried woman. If we could only move from the city, where he could not find us. I am so ashamed of myself, too, and yet there is only one way out of my trouble as I can see, and it is to frankly tell him the truth, which as you see is full of bitter humiliation for me, because he is a gentleman entirely worthy of respect. I promise you, old boy, you will never, never, lead me into such another scrape as this."

Wallie laughed and assured his troubled little wife that in all probability she would never see the infuriated captain again, and not to borrow trouble about it; but in truth he really believed the captain was actually in love with his wife, and, thinking the way clear for him, intended to pay court to her, and win her for himself—confident that if he knew the actual state of affairs—that his supposed Miss Nye, was in reality Mrs. Zane, a married woman, he was by far too honorable a gentleman to permit of his making love to another man's wife. But it puzzled him how to extricate his wife from these delicate difficulties in which she would never have become entangled had he not urged her to accompany him as an assumed character to that confounded surprise party for which he blamed himself severely. Consoling himself, however, with the thought that he would send his wife to visit his relatives at Minneapolis, as soon as the weather moderated, he gave up worrying about the matter. Early in the evening, a week after the above conversation had taken place, Mr. and Mrs. Zane were enjoying the evening at home. Wallie seated at the piano had just finished singing a favorite song for his wife, when the bell rang and the servant ushered into the parlor, a moment or two afterwards, Capt. Fitzhugh, who entered with his handsome honest face all wreathed in smiles, as he extended his hand in greeting to Miss Nye; avowing how delighted he was to meet her again.

Wallie greeted him cordially and then, extending his hand to his wife, said, "I will bid you good evening, Miss Nye, and will call to-morrow afternoon for our drive to the woods—good night." Poor Lunette, her hand trembled as she took that of her husband, and while she thought he ought to have remained with her and supported her in her trouble she felt that it was better perhaps for her to make her confession and explanation to the captain alone. So she allowed him to go without a word or sign, and resuming her seat did her best to entertain the captain; and so, at his request, she gladly took her seat at the piano and sang for him, feeling it a relief to be free, even for a few moments, from the unmistakable admiration in the eyes of the captain, which followed her every motion and never left her an instant. She sang again and again, wondering if he would never go!

In despair, and thoughtlessly, too, she seated herself on the sofa, at the other end of the room. The captain instantly perceived the advantage and took a seat beside her.

Al! poor little Lunette, your punishment is upon you! How often do the innocent suffer for the guilty! Mustering all her self-control and courage she waited for him to speak.

It was only a moment the captain kept her waiting—then taking one of her little hands in his, he told her of his love and begged for one word of her encouragement, and permission to pay his addresses. He reminded her of his lovely life and his ability to care for the choice of his heart.

Mrs. Zane was deeply affected. She patiently allowed him to make his declaration without interruption, and then with eyes sparkling with tears for the pain she knew she was about to inflict, she told him all the story of her own and her husband's folly, and begged his leniency and forgiveness. The captain looked dazed. He arose, walked over to the piano as one in a dream, deliberately took his hat and gloves, then turning towards her said:

"I do not understand, there is some mistake. You say that man who just went out that door is your husband? Surely, I do not hear him! Why, he is engaged to marry Miss Nellie Chotez," and placing one hand to his forehead he tried to leave the room by a door leading into a passage. Then perceiving his mistake he returned, and passed through the door Mrs. Zane had opened. As he did so, she laid a hand upon his arm and again asked for forgiveness. He looked a long lingering gaze into those tearful eyes that had become so dear to him, and in a kind and gentle tone said: "Oh, yes, I forgive you. I forgive you, but my life is ruined! ruined! ruined! But I forgive you," and quick as thought he seized her in his arms and pressed a kiss upon her lips and the next instant he was gone.

Wallie sent his gold-headed cane to him by express the next day. He had evidently forgotten it in his confusion. A month later, Capt. Fitzhugh was a passenger on an outward bound Canard.

$500 REWARD!

SOME irresponsible rascals have circulated what purports to be clippings from the New York Herald of January 25, 1892. The article slanders the NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY and is probably the cowardly work of competitors. The issue of the New York Herald contains nothing like it, and no other notice than that President Beers is likely to be retained. As this tends to refute all slanders against the Company.

I now offer a reward of Five Hundred Dollars for the discovery of the authorship of the lying statement and forgery distributed in these Islands concerning the NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE CO.
